Not illustrated. 1824 Excerpt: . . . fields that are sown with wheat, to open the water furrows with a plough, after the seed is covered, and to cut tracks across the end ridges, to allow the water to pass from the fields to the open ditches; and in some fields it is necessary to make several cross furrows with a plough, from the centre of the fields to the sides, so that as much water may not collect in the furrows betwixt the ridges, after a heavy fall of rain, as to carry away a part of the soil. The only culture which wheat requires when growing is in some instances to give it one stroke of harrowing as soon as the soil will bear that operation, in the spring season; and in all cases to roll it at that period, and to remove any injurious weeds with the hand or with a hoe, from the soil, that may spring up in the early part of summer. Although wheat is a hardy plant in some respects, it is subject to several very destructive diseases, the more noxious of which are smut and rust. Smut derives its name from the disordered wheat being converted into a substance of the appearance of soot. This disease may be noticed as soon as the ear springs out of the leaf in which it is formed. The smutted grain is of a roundish shape, and the substance which it contains is at first of a white colour,...
