With regard to program categories for which the budget currently provides misleading or incorrect incentives and signals, we recently reported that the cash-based budget provides neither complete cost information for budget decision-making nor the incentives necessary to control costs for 13 While smaller than the governments social federal insurance programs. insurance commitments, federal insurance is provided to individuals and businesses against a wide variety of risks, ranging from natural disasters under the flood and crop insurance programs to bank and employer bankruptcies under the deposit and pension insurance programs. These commitments could result in potentially large future obligations; however, their costs are not currently reflected in the budget at the time the government extends the insurance. Although it is often hard to predict the timing and magnitude of insured losses, estimates of the expected long-term costs of these future claims are available for many of the federal..
